FACULTY SPOTLIGHTS

Pam Kocher Brown, EdD

Dr. Brown is an AP professor in the Department of Kinesiology and serves as program director of the EdD in Kinesiology online program. She oversaw the transition of the EdD in Kinesiology into an online program and has developed and taught several online graduate courses, including an online pedagogy course. She serves on several departmental, school, and university committees related to curriculum and online teaching and learning.

Diane L. Gill, PhD

Dr. Gill is a professor in the Department of Kinesiology. Her research focuses on social psychology and physical activity. She has more than 40 years of experience as a faculty member, and she served as associate dean and department head at UNCG. She is a fellow of several professional organizations, including the American Psychological Association, the American College of Sports Medicine, and the National Academy of Kinesiology.

Michael A. Hemphill, PhD

Dr. Hemphill is an assistant professor in the EdD in Kinesiology online program in the Department of Kinesiology. His scholarship lies in teaching personal and social responsibility through sport, physical activity, and physical education. Particularly, he has focused on sport-based youth development through an urban squash program, which utilizes a sports program to promote personal and social development among youth.

Erin J. Reifsteck, PhD

Dr. Reifsteck is an assistant professor in the EdD in Kinesiology online program in the Department of Kinesiology. Her research focuses on promoting lifetime physical activity and health through the translation of psychosocial theory into practice. She was principal investigator on two NCAA-funded research grants focused on the Moving On! program, which prepares student-athletes for healthy transitions to life after college sports.

William “Bill” Karper, EdD

Dr. Karper is an associate professor in the exercise physiology group in the Department of Kinesiology. He is the founder and director of the fibromyalgia and chronic fatigue syndrome research and service exercise program. His work has been published often in the areas of exercise, chronic pain, and health. He has been a member of the UNCG faculty for more than 35 years.

TESTIMONIALS

“I have enjoyed the program immensely. To describe the KIN EdD program in one word, it is applicable. The lessons I’ve learned in the courses at UNCG were directly applied to my work as a professor in kinesiology-based courses. The program has helped me gain a better understanding of various university processes, such as hiring faculty, developing content, and creating new courses.”

Sean Preuss, 2015 Cohort

Instructor/Faculty Development Associate/Course Designer, Bryan University

“My professors have become trusted mentors, and members of my cohort are now friends and professional colleagues. I am grateful to be involved in an EdD program that challenges me to grow and supports me on a professional and personal level.”

Melinda Smith, 2015 Cohort

Applied Health Science Lecturer and Director of Student Wellness, Messiah College

“The faculty members are all incredible, and the format of the program allows me to work full-time, care for our young children, and earn an EdD from a nationally recognized program. I really would never have been able to get this degree and pursue my dream of teaching without UNCG offering this program. It literally is allowing me to change the direction of my career and life.”

Nicholas DeLangie, 2015 Cohort

Adjunct Professor/Associate Director of Admissions, Wingate University
